

In March 2026, researchers published over 2,800 papers on AI visibility.
At 26 pages average, that's 70,000+ pages in a single month.

Are you reading this?

Neither are most practitioners.
Not because they don't care. Because the volume is impossible.

We are closing that gap.

HOW BLURSOR WORKS

43%

of typically relevant pages receive zero citations under baseline conditions

Four ways citation fails

The taxonomy maps failures across the generative engine pipeline—fetching, parsing, and generation—and the distribution is uneven enough to matter for how you prioritize.

38%	Technical integrity
62%	Semantic alignment
27%	Content quality
<1%	Systemic exclusion

Technical integrity (10% of failures). The engine can't properly ingest the page. JavaScript-rendered content, access blocking, content overwhelmed by navigation boilerplate. These are upstream failures—optimization applied to a page with a technical integrity problem is wasted. A rough self-check: strip your page's HTML and read what remains. If your actual content is hard to find in that output, it's hard for a parser to find too.

01

We monitor research hubs for papers on AI visibility, LLM ranking factors, and how generative engines decide what sources to cite.

02

We filter for what matters in practice. We extract the findings that have real implications and distill them into readable, actionable articles.

03

Then we publish—the insights, the supporting data, and what it means for your work.

The original paper is always linked.

Diagnosing Citation Failures in GEO: What a New Paper From Virginia Tech Actually Shows

A new paper maps four distinct failure modes that prevent pages from being cited in AI-generated responses. 43% of relevant pages receive zero citations under baseline conditions.

KEY TAKEAWAYS FOR EXCEPTIONALLY BUSY PROFESSIONALS

Every distilled paper includes a key takeaway. We post it on X the day it publishes.
